ANSWERING THE QUESTION, "What's for Dinner?"

Lee founded Southern Sideboard while preparing for her oldest son's christening luncheon when she could not find ham biscuits, cheese straws, tomato aspic or a caramel cake anywhere in town. To her horror, even the local grocery store sold instant grits! After contemplating a move, she was reminded of her mother's Steele Magnolia type tribe that would descend upon the dining room with Junior League cookbooks and silver polish for any and all social functions. Those ladies pulled through again (refusing to let her son be dedicated to the Lord with instant grits) and when the celebratory weekend finally came, her parents arrived with southern staples and a pile of Junior League cookbooks. Lee set out to perfect said dishes and began offering them in "pop up shops".

For the past 20 years, Lee has been a fundraiser in both the political and non-profit arena. When COVID 19 eliminated her job in December 2019 due to restructuring, she turned to her love of iconic southern food and decided to start over. While she had the love and support of her inner circle, few thought starting a business in the middle of a pandemic was a good idea, especially with no money to invest in the start up. But with one client and $0 in a business account, that is exactly what she did. A little over a year later, Lee cooks meals weekly for 12 families, has a growing event catering service, her own commissary kitchen for other start up food vendors to utilize, and now is shipping her beloved cheese straws and pecan sandies. Today, Southern Sideboard offers family style meal prep services.
